Since the dawn of civilization, the humanity has believed that education is meant to prepare for life; however, such a concept is deemed to be inaccurate since education is measured as life itself. Unfortunately, our educational systems are set in such a way that they teach people how to make a living instead of teaching them how to make a life.

Life is a real battle, and we should be armed with education. A never-ending process called the development of mind should be followed throughout life to win the battle. Such development occurs through the interaction between inborn heredities (nature) and the environmental influences (nurture) through the life cycle.

We should all be aware of the fact that too many challenges are posed by life. Those challenges are considered as the best teacher ever to gain the entailed education for embarking upon life's complications. Such education is neither written in books nor taught or learned; it is attained while finding our path through the maze titled life.

Accordingly, an educated person is the one who is affluent in experience and who leads a morally decent and honorable life in a peaceful manner.
